

“During the three-day forum, there will be about 100 discussion sessions held concurrently on a variety of topics so that the participants can bring these ideas to their respective areas for implementation.

“If this can happen, the world’s hope of achieving the SDGs, agreements, declarations and so on can be seen through the progress in the cities around the world.

“Therefore, we need to catch up with the time as 2030 will come and go, and we will have another goal to achieve,” she said.

The forum has more than 7,000 participants from 60 countries.

It provides, among others, the opportunity to take action in addressing the challenges of critical urban development. — Bernama
